I glanced over my shoulder and looked down the sheer fifty-foot drop into the churning waters below. As my heart pounded, I tried to remain calm. One misstep and I'd fall to my death. Trapped between him and the water I struggled for a way to break free, but the menacing arch of his brow made it clear—do not cross him. Why hadn't I seen through this clever facade? My heart filled with regret. As I stared into his eyes that reflected his murderous gaze, a shiver raced up my spine. I knew this was my last chance to escape, but before I could act, he moved smoothly toward me like a shark in the water.

I swallowed. "You won't bury your sins this time."

He merely sauntered forward and smirked. "I already have.

Remember—everyone keeps secrets."

Description of Part One, Keeping Secrets:

Five years ago, one of the most horrific crimes imaginable occurred at the estate of the Crawford family. In the aftermath, the two youngest boys were kidnapped. But who kidnapped the young boys? And why?

It's now five years later and Simplicity Kendall—a girl whose life is anything but simple—is headed to a seemingly ordinary day of high school—that is until fate intervenes and tosses her into one harrowing adventure with the alluring new boy in town. CHAPTER ONE

Aftermath

William Crawford
Five Years Ago
-August 4, 2009-

Her scream still echoed in his ears—that horrible shrill sound human beings make right before they die. Twelve-year-old William trembled, not from the cold, but out of shock. He crossed his arms, pressed them into his stomach and began rocking back and forth. "It didn't happen. It didn't happen," he mumbled to himself. His little body went numb.

As William sat frozen in the passenger seat, a whimper came from the backseat of the car. He turned to look and the stiff, vinyl seat creaked underneath him. There lay his dog, Mack, wounded. It rested its head on his little brother's lap. The puppy's big, brown eyes blinked up at him. As William stared at the dog's injuries, guilt pressed down on his chest.

Charles stroked the dog's brown fur. "What was that loud bang I heard, William?"

Although William's jaw was broken, he strained to answer his brother, but the only sound he could make was a slurred groan. When the puppy tried to raise its head, it yelped in pain.

"Oh, it's okay." Charles patted the dog behind its crooked ear.

Overwhelmed with grief, William had to look away. He stared up the long circular driveway that ran across the front lawn of his family's estate. His gaze drifted until it locked onto the delicate, yellow flowers his mom had tenderly planted just a few days before.

Charles's little voice quivered, "I heard a girl scream."

William covered his ears trying to block her cries for help, but the sounds weren't coming from outside—they ricocheted within his head.

Charles squinted and looked around. "Where's Mom and Dad?"

A steel wall of denial slammed down as a void swept across William's mind—subconsciously shielding him from the truth.

A moment later, Charles pointed toward the house. "Here he comes."

William flinched. Instinctively, his hand reached for the door handle. He was about to bolt when he thought of Charles; he loved his brother dearly. Everything in him wanted to run, but he knew if he did, Charles wouldn't be able to keep up. William's stomach muscles tightened. He didn't know what to think about the awful things that would happen to his seven-year-old brother if he left him behind. William's shoulders slumped and he let go of the door handle.

A split-second later the driver's side door whipped open. When the car's engine roared to life, the tang of burnt oil blasted from the vents and stung William's nose. A cold tremor raced up the back of his neck when he noticed smeared blood on the car keys. The gearshift slammed into reverse. The car flew backwards. Gravel pelted the undercarriage.

As they drove from the crime scene, William's heart sank. Frantically, he searched through the trees, seeking out one last glimpse of his mother's bedroom window.
